

Rubber strips for the distribution box

Article Overview

Rubber strips for distribution boxes are primarily used for insulation, sealing, and protection against moisture, dust, and electrical hazards.

Types of Rubber Strips

- EPDM Foam Rubber Strips EPDM (ethylene propylene diene monomer) foam strips are widely used for sealing distribution boxes. They provide excellent weather resistance, aging resistance, and chemical corrosion resistance, making them suitable for outdoor and indoor electrical enclosures. These strips often come in d-shaped or half-round profiles and can be self-adhesive for easy installation.
- Insulating Rubber Mats and Strips Rubber strips made from insulating materials are used to prevent electric shock in distribution rooms or maintenance areas. They are available in various thicknesses, with higher thicknesses providing protection against higher voltages (e.g., 3mm for 6kV, 8mm for 25kV). These strips can be cut to size and placed under or around distribution boxes to enhance operator safety.
- Solid Rubber Strips for Structural Protection Some distribution boxes themselves are made from solid rubber, which is tough, high-impact resistant, and double insulated. These boxes may incorporate rubber strips as part of their construction to provide shock absorption and durability.

Key Features to Consider

- Adhesive Options: Self-adhesive strips simplify installation and ensure a tight seal without additional tools.
- Temperature Resistance: EPDM strips typically withstand -45°C to $+120^{\circ}\text{C}$, suitable for extreme environments
